SOME MIDDLE EAST observers must have been amused by the surprise that politicians, especially in Israel, displayed after the Palestine Liberation Organization last weekend renewed its rejection of the 1987 UN Security Council Resolution 242.

The PLO leaders "have shown their true colours," said the politicians. They sounded like they had rediscovered America. But those true colours were always there. The PLO has always opposed 242, which in one of its focal clauses guarantees the sovereignty of every state in the region, including Israel. The PLO has always wanted that resolution transformed into a new formula heralding the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip — as a first step towards its ultimate goal of a larger state in all of what was Mandatory Palestine, including Israel.

It should be no secret to the same politicians that even President Anwar Sadat's Egypt — "the most moderate and pro-peace Arab state" — goes along with that PLO formulation. The Egyptians are more subtle; they avoid sounding extremist and merely say that the PLO should settle for a mini-state now and "then develop a dialogue with Israelis" — presumably pacifists — for the creation of a greater "secular Palestinian state."

It is from this fact that questions, which some Israelis find rude, are derived. Among them: Why eliminate the PLO from the process of pursuing a settlement and work with Egypt, particularly since Sadat makes himself available to a Cairo-brand of Middle East peace only if Israeli capitulates and agrees to a total pullback to the pre-1967 frontiers, and the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip?

Amid its "peace" overtures, Egypt keeps on proclaiming its readiness to strike Israel "in depth." If the latter does not accept Cairo's version of a settlement. Similarly, Syria and Jordan warn of "catastrophic consequences," and the PLO peddles doomsday rhetoric.

ONCE THE BUTT of political and military ridicule, the PLO has reassumed an important role in the Middle East arena. It has not been given this role because of its strength, but because of inter-Arab and international politics. Its military debacles in Lebanon and Jordan, and its internal disintegration, have not caused the PLO to disintegrate. It has survived every intrigue it has triggered, often despite itself.

It is worth noting that the most recent elevation of the PLO's status, during the just-concluded Middle East tour of Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, came when the PLO was at one of its lowest ebbs. It had been battered, politically and militarily, in Lebanon. It was almost ignored when Middle East Arab governments shaped their joint strategy for talks with the U.S. Above all, its claim as the exclusive representative of all Palestinian Arabs was being challenged, for the first time, by individual intellectuals in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as well as in Jordan.

Much of the impetus for the PLO's revival came from the Arab states, especially those which championed the "Palestinian cause" in order to neutralize or get rid of the Palestinian Arabs living in their midst. These included Jordan, which had begun to feel that its 800,000 Palestinians were threatening the country's own security, and Lebanon, where 300,000 Palestinians triggered a still-not-fully concluded civil war. This is also true in the case of Syria, which houses some 200,000 Palestinians and oil-rich Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iraq and the Arab Emirates, where a quarter of a million Palestinians pose a threat to stability.

THE PHANTOM OF GENEVA

Despite its continued intransigence, as evidenced by its refusal last week to accept UN Resolution 242, the Palestine Liberation Organization's chances of representation at a Geneva peace conference appear undiminished. This is due to external factors, and does not indicate a sudden surge in the PLO's actual strength, writes Post Middle East Affairs Editor ANAN SAFADI.

Those Arab states have insisted that the crux of the Middle East conflict is the Palestinians, with the PLO designated as their "sole" representative at the October 1974 Rabat summit. The Rabat move was affected by three major factors — the Arab leaders' own fear of the PLO's spreading influence; the Soviet quest to steer the PLO into a key position at a time when Arab governments were responding to U.S. peace efforts; and Israel's refusal to respond positively to desperate attempts on the part of Jordan to regain a foothold in the West Bank after Israel concluded disengagement agreements with Egypt and Syria.

A MONTH later, the PLO's prominence created with what Westerners describe as Yasser Arafat's spectacular appearance at the UN General Assembly, as the PLO gained observer status there. Incidentally, Arafat is likely to repeat that performance at this month's General Assembly session, on the eve of which President Carter and Secretary Vance plan to hold talks with Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan and Arab foreign ministers then in New York.

THE PLO'S IMAGE was boosted by no less than President Carter last March, when he went on the record as calling for a "homeland" for the Palestinian refugees, "who have suffered for many, many years." Carter's remark — the first such made by an American President — served to build up the status of the PLO, even if he had meant only to confine his expression of concern to the 644,000 Palestinian Arabs living in 93 camps in the region. For it is in these camps that the PLO is a real and tangible entity.

In fact, President Carter was talking directly to the PLO, which he urged to accept Resolution 242 while practically dangling before it the possible results of accepting that resolution without modification.

"If the Palestinians should say 'We recognize 242 in its entirety though we think the Palestinians have additional status other than refugees,' that would suit us okay," said the president.

He added: "If the Palestinians will recognize the applicability of the UN resolution, then that would open up a new opportunity for us to start discussions with them and also open an avenue that they might participate in the Geneva conference."

The State Department went further, suggesting that the PLO's acceptance of 242 would not necessitate altering the PLO's Covenant, which considers Israel's existence as "null and void."

PROBABLY THE MOST significant aspect of these remarks is the fact that the U.S. Administration addressed the PLO as the unquestioned representative of the Palestinians. The statements treated the PLO and "the Palestinians" as synonymous; this action, if followed up, is bound to have considerable impact. In that very capacity, the PLO obviously felt confident enough last weekend to say "no" again to 242, and to blast the U.S. "imperialists" for suggesting that the resolution be accepted.

The PLO reiterated that it was seeking a new resolution, along the lines of General Assembly Resolution 3236, which reaffirmed "the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination, national independence and sovereignty."

In the meantime, Washington's hints were that the bridges with the PLO have not been totally burned. "Should they change their mind..." said a State Department spokesman, implying that some sort of dialogue with the PLO might be launched.

Dialogue might not be the right word. This writer was rebuffed by the American Ambassador to Israel, Samuel Lewis, upon suggesting that such a thing has already taken place in Alexandria, between the U.S. Ambassador to Egypt Herman Eilts and PLO representatives there. A "high-ranking" State Department official used a "barnyard expression" in responding to the same suggestion.

But Cairo's semi-official al-Ahram newspaper reported on Sunday that a "silent dialogue" between the U.S. and the PLO was already under way, despite the PLO's declared rejection of 242.

WHAT SEEMS to be evident is that the U.S., as well as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, are continuing to campaign for an alignment of the PLO with Arab peace negotiators. At the same time, there are signs that the PLO has been careful not to rule itself out of the current peace initiative, which Carter indicated was approaching its crucial phase this month. In addition to other factors, observers feel that Washington's demonstration of interest in the PLO is part of the Carter Administration's effort to reassure the PLO that it does not have to resort to its traditional means of terrorism and subversion in order to make itself seen or heard. Another reason is to prevent the PLO from being exploited by the Soviet Union, which in turn has been disappointed by the positive response of Middle East Arab governments to the exclusive U.S. orchestration of events in the region.

REGARDING U.S. overtures, the PLO is known to be divided into two major camps. One is the so-called "mainstream," which is led by Arafat, a 48-year-old engineer who is often referred to as a follower of Egypt. This camp's fluid Middle East policy guidelines might be outlined as follows:

□ The rejection of Security Council Resolution 242 which, while treating the Palestinians as refugees, calls for the recognition of the right of "every state" in the Middle East (including Israel) to exist within "secure and recognized" borders.

□ The pursuit of a Security Council resolution incorporating 242 with the recognition of the Palestinians' right to "return home," set up an independent state and receive compensation for property lost to Israel.

□ Incorporation of Palestinian representatives in Arab peace delegations, should Israel remain constant in her refusal to sit with an independent PLO delegation at forthcoming Geneva talks.

□ The acceptance of yet-unspecified links with Jordan, provided the Palestinians first set up an independent state on "parts of their soil."

Arafat's camp derives its power from his own Fatah movement, the largest sabotage grouping within the PLO, with an estimated membership of 8,000. This camp is also strongly supported by white-collar professionals, among them intellectuals active on the political scene abroad.

ON THE OTHER side is the "rejection front," which calls for a "Vietnam-style" war in the region and which opposes any kind of political settlement, or dialogue with the U.S. The rejectionists include Dr. George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), with an estimated membership of 2,000; Nayef Hawatmeh's Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PDFLP), embracing 500 men; and Abdul-Wahab Kayyali's Iraq-backed Arab Liberation Front (ALF), with 500 men.

The PLO's second largest single grouping — Zuhair Mohsin's Syrian-supported Sa'ek, with some 3,500 members, and the bulk of Ahmed Jibril's splinter group, the PFLP-General Command,

The Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism

Platform of the Movement

Principles

Judaism is the special way of the People of Israel, formulated in the course of the history of the nation from its beginnings to the present day. Rooted in the People's faith in its God and the Covenant between God and the People, Judaism created a living Torah whose main aspect of public and private life. The essence of Judaism derives from the religious influence of Judaism and the environment, and Judaism's capacity for renewal in constant response to the changing circumstances of time and place. However, in recent times the gap between the Torah and life has widened and the need to bridge the gap between tradition and the new reality has intensified. This new reality is the consequence of the re-establishment of our political independence, the return to Zion and the integration of Galilee, changes in social concepts, and the advent of science and technology. To respond to this reality is the aim of the Movement for Progressive Judaism. The right of the State to exist lies in its Jewishness, and this Jewish distinctiveness must find expression in its way of life. The renewal and adoption of the Jewish tradition will provide the Jewish People in their State with a spiritual impulse, an inner strength, and the social cohesion required to meet the internal and external challenges confronting us.

Aims

The Movement for Progressive Judaism aspires to strengthen the sense of belonging and loyalty of our people to the Jewish heritage and to base the State of Israel on the foundations of Jewish personal and social morality. The Movement aims to foster in Jewish society, both in the State and abroad, a Jewish way of life, a love of Israel and a cultural creativity drawing on the sources of Judaism.

Programme

In order to achieve these aims, the Movement stresses in its programmes and activities that Judaism should not be confined exclusively to matters of ritual and of personal status, but that the obligations of the mitzvot should impinge on the relationships between man and man, as well as on those between man and God. The movement believes that the proper fulfilment of the mitzvot is dependent on Kavanah (intent), that is: after study, understanding and acceptance and not by habit only. The aspiration to renew the old and sanctify the new" necessitates a dynamic approach to the mitzvot, based on the following premises:

- (a) The rationale of the mitzvah and its development over the course of centuries.
- (b) The ability of man to sanctify his life by means of the mitzvah.
- (c) The ability of a person to perform the mitzvah under the circumstances of place and time.
- (d) Responsibility towards Klal Yisrael.
- (e) The absence of a contradiction between the mitzvah and the dictates of conscience.

The Movement sees particular importance in the revitalization and amplification of the mitzvot involving man and his neighbor, and their application as religious duties incumbent on the individual and society. This special importance derives from the complexity of interpersonal relationships in modern society and from the special needs of Israeli society: the problems of the social gap, the integration of the Galilee, the absorption of new immigrants, and the existence of a large non-Jewish minority in the State.

The Movement in Society and State

The Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism invites every Jew who identifies with its aims and methods to join its ranks. The Movement seeks cooperation with other groups in Israel who share its purposes.

While the Movement for Progressive Judaism is a public, non-party movement, it will not refrain from taking a stand whenever the principles stated in this platform dictate. The Movement will strive for full rights for its rabbis and congregations, in the belief that pluralism is legitimate in Judaism, and that disagreement for the sake of God is salutary — "These and these are the words of the living God."

At the educational institutions and community centres of the Movement, we sponsor worship services, a youth movement, lectures, Shabbat, family events, preparation of children for Bar-Mitzva and Bat-Mitzva, and on-going community activities. The Movement also sponsors Garinim for the settlement of the Movement's first kibbutz, Yehel, in the Arava.

which was shattered by Lebanon's civil war — both appear to be playing the waiting game with the Damascus-Amman axis. So does the 6,000-man semi-regular Palestine Liberation Army (PLA), which was also battered by the PLO's sabotage tactics in Lebanon on the eve of Syria's dispatch of its own troops into that country late last year.

Still on the sidelines are the 680,000 West Bankers and the Geza Strip's 880,000 inhabitants, whose independent political voices are less than substantial. In their separate platforms, Romellah lawyer Azis Shihadeh and Hebron lawyer Hussela Shukhi represent a local attempt to share policy-making with the PLO, rather than a direct challenge to its right to lead.

ISRAEL CERTAINLY must bear a good deal of the blame for the relatively low level of response from local leaders, and from Jordan. During the past decade, neither has been provided with a concrete formula, with which they could combat the PLO during the period of its major growth.

Did the Carter Administration turn to the PLO, then, because it had no choice — because there was no other address on the Palestinian issue?

It would seem that the U.S. will continue to flirt with the PLO, in the hope of developing a dialogue, despite the PLO's rejection of 242. The ultimate aim would still be to bring the PLO into line with Arab states cooperating with Washington. Should the Americans fail, it will certainly not be for lack of effort. And should they succeed, that success will have a disturbing effect on U.S.-Israel relations.

THE ASSUMPTION that the PLO issue has been taken out of the U.S.-Israel agenda as a result of the PLO's rejection of 242 sounds too good to be true. The Carter Administration, though less optimistic about Middle East peace prospects than it was initially, appears to be determined to go ahead with its attempts to find a compromise that would bring the PLO into the negotiating process.

The one point where Israel is on strong ground is in its legal right to veto the participation. In further sessions, of any party not represented at the opening of the Geneva peace conference in December, 1978. This right is enshrined in the U.S.-Israel Memorandum of Agreement, drafted after the September, 1975 Sinai Interim agreement with Egypt. But should Israel appear "unreasonable" in its insistence to use that veto — perhaps on a new formula which would include a PLO pledge to back down from its declared aim of dismantling Israel — Jerusalem might find itself under pressure from increasingly "impatient friendly countries."

Direct material pressure could have the effect of uniting Israelis, and U.S. Jewry, behind the Israeli government's position. There is also the possibility of other kinds of psychological pressures, calculated to divide and weaken from within. This possibility must not be discounted by anyone wishing to bet on continued extremism, and a rejectionist stance, from the PLO.

GETTING AN EARLY START

VISITORS to this country are mildly puzzled when they see toddlers trotting off every morning with their sun-hats and sandwich-bags. They are even more puzzled when they notice some of the thousands of three-month-old babies who are taken out to minders (metaphor) from 7.30 a.m. onwards.

According to the Education Ministry's Early Childhood Division, which has been greatly expanded over the past five years, we have every right to be proud of our pre-school network, which is proportionally larger than that of any other country. Apart from all the five-year-olds attending free compulsory kindergarten, 87 per cent of all three-year-olds — and perhaps 30 per cent of the two-year-olds — attend nursery schools.

The second figure is, unfortunately, only a conservative guess. The Ministry has no date when the number of babies who are in the charge of a minder, or on the one- to two-year-olds who are cared for in groups in private homes (pentonim).

Israeli mothers, if their enthusiasm for pre-school facilities is anything to go by, both need and want to work outside their homes. There is hardly a poor urban area or a development town without either a day-care centre for children from three months to three years, which is provided by the women's organizations, or a State nursery school for three- to five-year-olds. The graded tuition fees are still low enough to make it worthwhile for a working-class mother to take a job outside her home.

The Education Ministry has given first priority to the State nursery schools, since it sees them as the ideal place to provide disadvantaged children with the intellectual stimulus believed to be lacking in their homes. A middle-class mother, however, very often cannot squeeze her children into these facilities, and the younger her child is, the more she will look to the private market.

THE MINISTRY does have some slight control over the care of two-year-olds, insofar as its regulations permit them to inspect any private nursery school "where there are at least 11 three-year-olds." (The rest of the class, especially since more and more State nursery schools for three-year-olds are being opened, may include up to 30 two-year-olds.)

According to the reasoning currently accepted at the Ministry, if a parent can afford to pay for private care, his child is not disadvantaged, and therefore not in dire need of the intellectual stimulus a nursery school is supposed to provide. Oddly enough, by the time a child starts school at the age of six, other factors are introduced to assess his level of disadvantage, such as his parents' level of education. Under the age of six, a group in which, according to the Ministry criteria, there are 40-50 per cent disadvantaged, only economic criteria seem to apply.

A more subtle reason for the complete lack of Ministry inspection for children under two is perhaps that many women educators, particularly the more ambitious and powerful ones, prefer to leave the rearing of their own offspring to other people, during the morning hours at least.

Most of the six-year-olds who started first grade yesterday are already well broken-in to the educational system. The vast majority of them started nursery school at the age of three, which is earlier than anywhere else in the world.

SUSAN BELLOS takes a look at the pre-school sector.

The Education Ministry's manpower department has no specific data on the number of women who return after three months' maternity leave. However, educational circles both inside the Ministry and in the Teachers' Union confirm that almost all women teachers return to work after an absence of 3-12 months, following the birth of their first child.

DR. NEHAMA NIR, who directs the Early Childhood Division, stayed at home with her children until they reached the age of two. But though she and her colleagues officially frown on the minder system, there is no pressure group among women educators against an arrangement that, after all, permits them to pursue their careers.

Minders, says Dr. Nir, are generally not much good, though they are better than a day-care centre for a baby or a toddler. The right kind of minder, in her opinion, is somebody who does much more than see that a baby is fed properly and kept reasonably clean and comfortable.

A baby has to be played with, talked to and loved, and if a minder neglects to do this, the child may actually be harmed. Good minders are hard to come by in Israel, Dr. Nir said, because they usually have a low social status, and hence the job tends to attract poorly-educated women.

If what Dr. Nir says is correct, there is the fascinating paradox of many of the educators of the disadvantaged in Israel — from educational psychologists to kindergarten teachers — preferring to leave the rearing of their own offspring partially brought up by women themselves would classify as disadvantaged. The rearing is done mostly during the child's most wakeful hours, at an age which, according to their own textbooks, is most crucial in a child's development. It is also odd that, while education has always been regarded as enormously important in Israel, child-care is generally looked down on.

If there are no strictly pedagogic reasons why a middle-class child should have to go to nursery school by the time he is three, many parents feel that, apart from the morning relief, there will be few children left to play with if a child stays at home.

Private and public nursery schools are usually from 8 a.m. to 12.30 or 1 p.m., as opposed to the first, second and third grades, which end at 11.45, at least a few days a week. According to the Education Ministry spokesman, it is hoped that this "temporary" out (which has been going on for three years) will be rectified by April, 1978. Interestingly, he added: "We found that the children did not suffer if we decreased their learning time at this age."

WHAT DOES Dr. Nir think a two- or three-year-old should be doing all morning?

"Experiencing with all his senses in a totally unstructured way," she replied. In plain language this means: paint, clay, sand, water, music, songs and rhymes. It also means, she added, no compulsory sitting-down story-telling sessions for the whole class, which is a common feature throughout the pre-school sector.

How would Dr. Nir advise a tion he gets. It is also dangerous to leave one adult alone with 20 to 35 children, unless that adult undertakes to refrain from going to the toilet.

If there are 35 children, which is the Ministry's limit for three-year-olds, the building must be at least 67-81 sq. m. Toys and equipment must be within easy reach and there should be a good yard. This doesn't mean merely sand and climbing equipment, but creative materials, clay, wooden mallets and pegs, and "lots of junk." Children are generally sent out to play for up to two hours after their 10.30 sandwich break, and it is important, Dr. Nir said, that they have plenty to do outdoors.

The simplest single test of a prospective teacher, Dr. Nir said, is her attitude towards parents. A mother should ask how often parents' meetings take place, and the answer should be at least once a month. The acid test is for a parent to suggest coming in one morning to observe and maybe help. "If the response is negative," Dr. Nir said, "forget it. The teacher is unsure of herself and has something to hide."

Last year Dr. Nir's division closed 70 private nursery schools, and this year there will be 11 supervisors working only in this area. The division is also bringing out a handbook for private teachers, with special emphasis on work with two-year-olds, and is offering in-service training to unqualified teachers.

However, it is difficult to imagine that the nursery schools mentioned above were closed down for failure to meet the standards Dr. Nir mentioned. State compulsory kindergartens and nursery schools, which have fully-qualified teachers and are regularly supervised, do not meet them either. There are, for example, no specifications about the aide's education or training; many kindergartens have parents' meetings up to five times a year; and few playgrounds at Jerusalem's nursery schools have more than sand and climbing equipment.

ONE State teacher, whom we shall call Malka, put it this way: "It doesn't make sense to go into the private market unless you are unqualified." A private teacher, she explained, has to run a business as well as educate, and therefore she has to have some kind of profit margin.

Twenty children, plus a good helper, plus income tax and VAT, not to mention the capital outlay on — and constant renewal of — fairly expensive equipment, does not yield much profit these days. Unless the teacher lives in an unusually spacious home, she may have to rent premises to meet Dr. Nir's requirements. Malka estimated that to run a nursery school at some sort of profit today, there would have to be no fewer than 30 children, especially if a helper is also employed.

Not unnaturally, most private kindergartens offer inferior services, since few parents can afford to pay for the kind of standard Dr. Nir has set. The result is that, if the Education Ministry's own criteria are to be taken seriously, so-called disadvantaged children are actually being deprived at a most important stage in their development. □

THE COST OF DISENGAGEMENT

The Sinai interim agreement this month enters its third — and possibly last — year. Military Correspondent HIRSH GOODMAN describes the logistical problems faced in the 1975 move of Israel's southern line of defense and immensely complicated task coordinated by civilian volunteer Shimon Sirkin (photo at left).

LATER THIS MONTH the second Sinai disengagement agreement between Israel and Egypt will enter its third — and possibly last — year. When it was signed in September, 1975, the pact meant to some people that the two countries that had clashed in war five times in 20 years had finally taken the first step along the road to normal relations. Others regarded the agreement as little more than a sell-out to American pressure, Israel having given up the all-important Mitla and Gidi passes, as well as the rich oilfields at Ras Sudar and Abu Raddis, for hardly anything in return.

But to thousands of men and women serving in the army at the time, the agreement meant little more than a huge logistic headache. Hundreds of thousands of mines had to be retrieved when the lines were moved. Kilometers on kilometers anti-tank ditches three metres deep had to be refilled before being abandoned. Some 12,000 km. of fences were rolled up and redeployed. A new 180-km. road had to be built through the desert. Water lines had to be pulled out, bunkers dismantled. All this while Israeli forces in the area continued to maintain a high state of alert.

By February 22, 1976, just five months after the agreement was signed in Geneva, Israel had vacated 6,180 sq. km. of the Sinai, leaving little behind to testify to almost 10 years of military presence in the area.

The huge military camps which had served as depots for the men on the Bar-Lev line, and, indeed, along the entire front with Egypt, were stripped to the bare essentials, repainted, cleaned up and handed over to the United Nations.

Within six months, all the Israeli bunkers along the disengagement line were reduced to rubble, but not before every item that could be salvaged had been removed and itemized. One example to be found in the inventory: 838,000 metal shovels, 1.8m. long and costing IL200 each, were pulled out one by one and re-used in other areas.

All in all, it is estimated, IL200m. in building materials — none — windows, doors, frames, bricks, railings — was brought out from the area handed over by Israel.

Over 170 bulldozer tractors were employed full-time during the pullback; thousands of trucks were used. Quarries were operated in order to provide the materials for new roads being constructed. All this machinery had to be serviced and repaired. Fuel had to be provided, man had to be fed. The logistics of this thing are mind-boggling.

TECHNICALLY, the operation was undertaken by the Engineering Corps. Private contractors — in contrast to the building of the Bar-Lev line — played a very minor role. But the man behind it all was a civilian volunteer,

A horse on the causeway as Israeli troops leave Africa. (Below) Israeli and UN officers discuss the 2nd interim agreement.

(Rubinger, Guiton)

Shimon Sirkin — who has become a legend in the Engineering Corps. Sirkin is famous for his unparalleled energy.

He was already a pensioner when he built the Bar-Lev Line. The pullback operation — its still-secret name was chosen by a computer — proved to be one of the most complicated ventures ever undertaken by the Engineering Corps. It required the coordination of minute details between military and civilian. It needed a man who could rise above the petty jealousies of rank and circumstance. It needed a man who could first request from the general, and then demand of his agents, that they be completed. The job had to be completed by February 22. The agreement would take effect then, whether Israel was ready or not.

The moving of this line was only half the problem. It had to be done in such a way that at no time could the Egyptians, who were not involved in a logistic shake-up, launch yet another surprise attack.

The problem was less acute in 1974, during the second disengagement, than during the first. In 1974, when Israel was not helped by both the UN and the American forces in the disengagement area. In 1974, Israel had simultaneously to pull back from "Mitla" and build a new line with its self-contained strongholds, each requiring millions of tons of earth and rock that had to be hauled in overland.

Like new minefields had to be laid, at the same time as hundreds of thousands of mines were being pulled out in Africa (each costing around IL200), and a new infrastructure had to be built in order that, should the need arise, Israel would be able to dispatch reinforcements to any point along the line within the shortest possible time.

THE SECOND pullback, the question of Egyptian attack seemed somewhat, but still remained a possibility. The problem now was mainly that of dismantling what had been put up in the postwar "hysteria," (as one officer described it), and making sure that as little as possible went to waste.

But there were other problems. As a result of the agreement, Israel's land border with Egypt stretched in length to over 300 km. New access roads had to be built. Tremendous effort went into clearing the early warning station at Um Hashiba, almost much as was placed on early warning capability as an insurance in case the elements of goodwill and elements of mutual trust which had been written into the agreement were to melt away.

But apart from the logistics, not much else was involved militarily. The agreement was, in essence, a political one. By introducing guarantors — the UN and the U.S. — into the picture, it removed the possibility of war one rung further down the ladder. Egyptians and Israelis were no longer in an eyeball-to-eyeball situation where a disgruntled soldier's inadvertent bullet could theoretically escalate into a conflict.

Of course, the military had to be ready to ensure Israel's security should war break out; but the agreement was mainly a political one. Would the Egyptians allow cargoes destined for Israel through the Suez Canal? Would Egypt stop its vicious anti-Israel propaganda within international bodies? In essence, would the agreement be the first step on the road to normalization?

THERE ARE DIFFERENCES of opinion as to the over-all wisdom of Israel's entering into the agreement. Those who dissent usually make their judgments in a vacuum, not being apprised of all the factors that went into the decision-making process. Factually, one can say that from a purely military point of view, the agreement has been good for Israel. There has been no war of attrition. Indeed, not a single bullet has been fired in anger in the Sinai for over two years. Because of that fact Israel no longer has to hold a static line, and because there is a new strategic concept based on high mobility, reserve duty is down to a minimum — which is good both for the morale of the country and for its economy.

While the loss of the Gidi and Mitla passes poses a potential problem, the problem is a theoretical one and officers questioned have admitted that giving up the passes was a bargaining point rather than an actual issue of strategy. For although the passes have been relinquished, Israel still controls the exits and the ridges overlooking the Gidi.

The military problems have been almost insignificant, because they were predicted and worked out at the negotiating table. New roads were financed primarily by the U.S., to replace those given up. The unhindered use of the joint road along the lower sector of the Gulf of Suez has been guaranteed both by a U.S. presence, and by a mutuality of interest that deters either side from breaking the understanding.

Israel invested heavily in ensuring that the agreement did not translate itself into her being forced into a militarily inferior position. The new strategy of high mobility demanded the building of a whole new infrastructure of emergency stores near the front, so that the time-lag between the outbreak of a conflict and an Israeli presence in the battlefield would be minimized.

WHILE IT IS the considered opinion of the experts — the almost unanimous considered opinion of the experts — that the disengagement pact has not been detrimental to Israel in purely military terms, the question must be asked whether it has brought us closer to peace. Have the political goals been attained — the goals that were aimed at when Israel gave up oilfields producing millions of dollars worth of oil per year, and the passes?

Goods destined for Israel have passed through the Canal and continue to do so. The Egyptian propaganda effort continues but some claim that it is less voracious than formerly.

The Egyptians have, by and large, kept to the terms of the disengagement pact — even though there have been charges of foul play by injecting unauthorized extra men and material. Observers point with satisfaction to Egypt's unilateral return of the bodies of Israeli soldiers killed in action and say that over all, the Egyptians — especially since the pact — have been a moderating behind-the-scenes influence in Israel's surreptitious relationship with the Arab world.

If a step nearer peace is synonymous with a step further away from war — which not all believe it is — then the interim agreement has indeed brought peace closer. It is generally conceded that with the American and UN presences in the region, the possibility of an outbreak of war has been limited. This, of course, does not mean that war is less likely if other aids opt for it for political ends; but it does mean that the initiation of war by either party becomes more complicated and more cumbersome, and thus less likely. A complicating factor, it is pointed out, usually leads to more procrastination.

Authoritative opinion seems to be that yet another pullback can be expected at some stage — most probably when the current agreement comes to an end in September, 1978, or when (and if) Israel and the Arabs ever get round to speaking at Geneva. While it is regarded as unlikely that the Egyptians would again move alone, without some other advances being made elsewhere, the question, then, is not whether there will be another Sinai withdrawal, but where will it be to, and under what conditions.

While reticent about discussing politics, most senior officers questioned on the subject are not unduly worried about the possibility. None of the logistic problems faced in 1974 and 1976 will be encountered again, even though moving the huge military complex that has sprung up around Refidim and the Um Hashiba stations can be expected to pose problems. The officers feel that if the principle of limited forces zones and demilitarized areas is adhered to, Israel's security will not be greatly jeopardized.

It is also important, they say, that the concept of the vacuum left by the Israeli retreat be filled by UN and American troops, that they be retained as yet another trip-wire — another stumbling-block, on the road to war.

A new retreat in the Sinai, it is argued, will still allow Israel enough manoeuvring space and strategic depth should war break out, and it is felt that any conflict could still be comfortably contained far from Israel's centres of population.

Despite this, however, there is total opposition to any retreat unless this time, the political benefits are clear and well-defined. The point is made that the next pullback will in all probability be the last. Israel will have played her hand, and her last bargaining chip will have been thrown onto the negotiating table.

A TIGER CALLED TEL AVIV

The Medrano Circus was last here 19 years ago. But one of its feline performers should feel at home in the city he's named after. The Post's CATHERINE ROSENHEIMER takes us behind the scenes at the Big Top. The Photographs are by Lester J. Millman.

IT WAS A quiet domestic morning at the circus. Peppino the clown rode off to the supermarket on his motorbike. Francello the tiger-tamer was sprinkling fresh sawdust in the big cats' cage. Elvio Togni's performing elephants were taking their morning promenade, circling sedately around the ring inside the Big Top.

Elsewhere, ladies of the circus were occupied with routine chores: sitting on deck-chairs outside their caravans, peeling potatoes, sewing on stray spangles, getting their fridges and washing machine linked up to the portable generator, hanging up laundry on makeshift washlines strung between vans.

When there is no performance on, behind-the-scenes life at the Medrano Circus, the Italian Big Top currently pitched on the outskirts of Tel Aviv, is much like that of any large camping site. Except, of course, that relaxed as it may appear, many of the routine daily chores are matters of life and death. If the animals are not sufficiently exercised, if their meal times are upset, if they have any cause for feeling nervous, there may be fatal accidents in mid-air.

Trapezes, tight-ropes, safety nets and all other equipment and paraphernalia have to be checked and adjusted constantly, every nut and bolt correctly tightened so that no accidents occur because of faulty maintenance.

The human element of error is something else: each performer is responsible not only for his own equipment or animals, but also for keeping himself in perfect "working order" with daily limbering up and practice sessions.

The last time a full-scale circus visited Israel was eight years ago. Medrano's previous tour here was in 1968: their site in Tel Aviv at the time was an empty lot on Kikar Malchei Yisrael, where City Hall now stands. Members of the circus who still remember that first visit regret that urban development has pushed them to the outskirts of town (just north of the Bar Yehuda Bridge), where they foot somewhat suited — not that they would have much time for shopping, eighteenth or going to the beach in any case.

SETTING UP camp on the barren area of sand dunes allotted to them is not without its discomforts. Those who lived in "Little Tel Aviv" at the turn of the century may sympathize with them. Water supplies are makeshift, electricity is provided by a generator that is switched off late every night. The sandy ground is difficult to walk on and not firm enough for some of the more tricky balancing and acrobatic acts. And the traditional circus sawdust has had to be discarded. Although hundreds of sacks were provided, it all sank into the sand, and the circus has had to resort to spreading along tarpaulin sheets on the ground when a stable surface is required.

Behind the glitter, the arid lights, the fancy costumes and the smiling faces you see in the ring, there are undercurrents of discontent.

FRANCIS BYK, the tiger-tamer, is outspoken in his criticism. "But you journalists only write what the public relations people tell you to," he begins. "None of us is really satisfied."

Dutch-born Francis, alias Francello for programs purposes, has worked with lions, tigers, polar bears and elephants. He learned his craft over 10 years of intermittent study at the Falkenburg wild animal school in Holland. He is a permanent member of the Tony Circus, on contract to Medrano for the duration of the Israel tour. He is here with his wife, five-year-old son Oscar, and three-month-old baby.

"All the bosses are interested in making money," he continues. "And all we hear are promises, promises, promises. They still haven't provided the showers we asked for — surely no luxury in this heat. And every night after the show, we have no lights. Worse than that, the fridge goes off too and the baby's milk is sour every morning."

In Italian circuses, practically every child follows in his parents' footsteps. But Francis is determined that his children will not follow suit. "Next year my son starts school," he says, "and then I'm finished with circus life. We shall settle in one place — I shall work in a zoo or a safari park, and our children will have a normal life and a decent education."

Earlier, when I had wanted to talk to Byk, I received a rather cool reception. He had been busy cleaning the tigers' cage and feeding them each a huge carcass. He apologized for his brusqueness. "In my profession, the animals have to come first," he explains.

His pretty, petite, Czech-born wife, Maria, a former trapeze artist, will also be happy to leave the circus. "Each time Francello goes into the tiger cage, and during every performance, I think with dread of the moment when one of the managers will come up to me, shake my hand, and say 'Sorry, your husband had an accident.' And this is a job with no pension, a profession which no life insurance company would be prepared to underwrite."

Tigers have no sentiments, Francis assures me. One false move from him, and they would attack relentlessly, despite the fact that he has known each of them for two years, and started training them at eight months. One of his charges is named Tel Aviv, the son of a female cub born when the Medrano circus was last here 19 years ago.

OTHER THAN the overheads and administrative problems involved in transporting an entire circus from Trieste to Tel Aviv — partially by sea, partially by rail — very little has changed in the world of the circus in generations.

"The circus is not a program spectacle. It still is, and always was, traditional," says Peppino, the clown, one of those who was here 19 years ago and, like his family in the business for generations, is well-qualified to speak.

He started out as a trapeze artist and an acrobat as a child, now, in later life, he's taken over the strenuous role of a clown. Like most of the old-established Italian circus people, most of them closely related, who make up the majority of the troupe, he has no misgivings about the continuity of circus life. His own son and daughter have followed the footsteps, both appearing on the trapeze in the current show.

There is nothing of the clown about Peppino. His cheerful face is constantly wreathed in smiles.

"Happy? Of course I'm happy," he says. Why should he be sadder than anyone else? Peppino can still remember the days of the horse-drawn, painted gypsy caravans in which he was born and brought up, with which the circus troupe came 40 years ago. But the caravans are all the same. The old squirts water through their noses, have flashing lights in their

AMICI MIEI — Granted and partially filmed by the late Pietro Germi: the romping escapades of a group of middle-aged men, whose friendship is cemented by a love for absurd pranks. An assemblage of alienations which vary from good farce to empty notion. Depriving to take the film seriously.

ANNIE HALL — Woody Allen's latest and most personal film about the relationship between an ill-matched couple. Touching, humorous and totally convincing with the usual stock of verbal and visual gags. Stars Woody Allen as comedian Alvy Singer and Glance Keston as Annie Hall.

BATTLE OF MIDWAY — Plenty of action and suspense, with Hal Holbrook as the head of a U.S. naval combat intelligence group that broke the Japanese secret code during World War II. Excellent cast includes Charlton Heston, Henry Fonda and James Coburn.

THE DOMINO PRINCIPLE — Unconventional, unsettling assassination thriller. With Gene Hackman, Candice Bergen and director Stanley Kramer, all the ingredients are there, but it never gets off the ground.

HARRY AND WALTER GO TO NEW YORK — Likable comedy set in the 1960s in which Michael Caine plays a seal and outwitted millionaire safe-breaker. James Caan and Elliott Gould jolly along as a couple of vaudevillean pick-pockets, determined to reach the big bank and before him. Some memorable laughs in an exclusive New York private club.

THE INCREDIBLE SARAH — Free parody of the early life of famous French actress Sarah Bernhardt. Lavish settings, well-known cast, and an overpowering Gilda Jackson.

KING OF HEARTS — Comedy set in World War I background. About a Scottish soldier who tries to save a small French town from destruction by the Germans and unwittingly becomes king for a day, ruling the harmless inmates of the town's asylum.

LE OANO — It is 1944. Alain Delon is pretty. He has a gang and a girl. He smiles and smokes simultaneously. He is shot. He is buried. He was beautiful. Directed by Jacques Deray. In French, English subtitles.

PEYTON PLACE — 1957 Academy Award winning film based on Grace Metalious' novel about life in a small New England town. Gossip, affairs, plus other ingredients that combine to produce soap opera trivia. Redemptive features are good photography, and a strong cast that includes Mark Robson and Lana Turner.

Chauvinism at the Kol-Bo

IT IS PROBABLY going to be a matter of sink or swim for Israeli manufacturers over the next decade. The abolition of import tariffs for Israeli imports into EEC countries, which came into force on July 1, is a reciprocal agreement. On Israel's side, the agreement is to lower import tariffs on EEC-produced imports by degrees, reaching zero duty by 1987.

Israeli manufacturers lived in a very protected glasshouse through the quarter-century years and up until the early Sixties, when competing imports were virtually nil. They still have a big advantage with the present duty situation, but eventually will have to face fierce competition from the Common Market. If they are to do this, they will have to pull their socks up considerably where quality, design and value are concerned.

Aware of this, a year and a half ago the Manufacturers Association decided to launch a big "Blue-White" division for the promotion and improvement of local goods. While many stores, notably Hama Shikri Litzman, have for several years been running annual promotions for Israeli-made goods, Kol-Bo Shalom has always gone in the opposite direction, devoting at least one annual "week" to the products of a foreign country.

At the Blue White Division's inauguration, Kol-Bo Shalom's "Salute to Israeli Products" will be opening today, offering reductions of between 10 per cent and 50 per cent on a range of a thousand products in special sections in each of the store's departments, covering everything from household goods, fashions, cosmetics and food.

Catherine Rosenhelmer

In a few cases, the Kol Bo has managed to persuade fashion manufacturers to let them have ranges of export fashions for next summer, identical to those shown at last week's export Fashion Week. "But on the whole," says Kol Bo manager Shai Mayer, "we have a hard time persuading them to give us the heat of their export ranges. There is still a feeling among many manufacturers that while they have to 'export or bust,' they can get away with inferior workmanship and design on the local market — other than a handful of our top manufacturers. This is going to have to change over the next decade if they want to stay in business."

Kol Bo Shalom has always had the reputation of being more expensive than competitive stores — an allegation which Shai Mayer has heard many times before and which, not unnaturally, he is quick to deny. "When we opened, as the largest and most modern store of our kind in the country, people assumed that we were more expensive. Over the years, we have proved that we are a popular department store, often in a position to offer discounts on lines we buy in bulk, and I think the public has learnt this too."

Despite the present Blue-White Campaign, some 40 per cent of Kol Bo Shalom's merchandise is imported. Policy, he says, is to offer the best value in the best product of its type, regardless of origin. What of the well-known and often totally unjustified "month appeal" of imports? It dates back, he says, to the time when imports were such a rarity as to give them great appeal. His store aims to give the consumer a fair choice of comparable products, both local and foreign.

In a few spheres, notably glassware, furniture and lighting fixtures, local ranges are definitely limited. But fashions, soft furnishings, local cosmetics and foodstuffs made here have improved tremendously over the years.

At the same time, he claims, Shalom Stores offers facilities no one else here can supply: monthly credit facilities, a country-wide dispatch service and, in addition to all its retail departments, a workshop, museum, children's funfair — Mayerland — and rooftop observatory, all under one roof. □ wear outsize shoes, peddle... And the audiences are as enthusiastic as ever.

Medrano, son of the owner, is one of the younger generation Italian, and the most energetic and charming person in the whole troupe. He appears with the team and with the dancin' girls, performs acrobatics on the trampoline, and is always in the background, superintending the proceedings. When I was relaxing over a beer with his cousin, Helmut Rossini, a life-long member of the troupe, which were more in the background, they agreed, the tour was going well.

Audiences in Europe are apalled where circuses are concerned; but here in Israel, a circus is a rare novelty, and audiences are enthusiastic. And if you have a good time, as we do, you will be received everywhere," says Medrano.

Medrano, he says, is the best circus in Italy, booked in advance for years, and an excellent proposition commercially. They are under contract here for three months, with an option to extend the period — last time they stayed for seven-and-a-half months.

After Tel Aviv, they will appear in Haifa, Jerusalem and Beersheba. To judge by the crowds that are packing the 3,500-seat Big Top twice a day, clowns, tigers, elephants, tight-rope walkers, seals, spangles and candy does have still not lost their magic. □

VIENNA HAS a strange attraction for me: it is a love-hate relationship. I cannot deny that Vienna shaped me. I can hardly work without a background of classical music; no song can stir me like a Schubert lied.

I treasure the memories of journeys to Canada, Patagonia and New Zealand, because their meadows and mountain peaks resemble the landscapes of my childhood. I am sure I will die with a pun on my lips, that "lowest form of wit" that was considered the height of humour along the banks of the Danube.

There is no need to explain the hate part of my relationship. I had better not go into details. Just witnessing the delirium with which "rasped" Austria greeted its conquering prodigal son was nauseating enough for a lifetime. So why ever go back?

On my first trip, I come to confirm my hatred, and the Austrians obliged. Later on, we induced my wife's Viennese nanny to come and look after our children in Jerusalem, and visiting her when she finally retired provided a pretext for dropping in to Vienna whenever we were in Europe.

My resolve to hate was considerably weakened when, in 1986, I saw a masterful performance of Arthur Schnitzler's Professor Bernadine at Vienna's famous Burgtheater. To hear a Viennese audience applaud this brilliant indictment of anti-Semitism somehow soothed my seared feelings. And then, the Austrians elected a Jew, Bruno Kreisky, as their Bundeskanzler, the equivalent of prime minister. Never mind what kind of a Jew Bruno Kreisky is — it was still a remarkable sign.

So why do I always wince when somebody praises the charms of Vienna? Why can't I let bygones be bygones? As I sit on a bench in the Augarten, the playground of my childhood, I become aware that it is no longer the trauma of Vienna under Hitler, but the memories of my first return that prevent my unalloyed enjoyment of the undeniable beauty of this city.

THE HITCHHIKER I poked up on the Ariberg Pass was Viennese, with all that implies in honeyed politeness and eagerness to please. Having noticed the French plates on my little Renault, he made some flattering remarks about France.

"I'm not French," I said. "I thought not," said he, "your German is too good. You must be German, Bavarian, I presume." For the next few moments I had to concentrate on passing a big truck ahead on the winding road. My companion took my silence to be a confirmation of his statement, and he immediately began lauding the German-Austrian comradeship in arms during World War II. A Bavarian had been his closest buddy. I was amused by his flexibility, and said I was not a German.

"Well, where do you come from, if I may ask?" "At the moment," I answered, "from the United States." "America!" he exclaimed. "Where would we be without America? What a generous, idealistic country!" When he had finished I said, "Look here, let's finish this game. This country used to be my home. I was kicked out. I'm a Jew." He thought for a moment, and then he said, "I never would have believed it."

That's where I came in I thought. Here we go again. The greatest compliment my companion could pay me was that I could pass as an "Aryan."

IT TOOK ME four days, because I dawdled, to reach Vienna. As I drove into the city, the old distances and sizes seemed amazingly shrunken, and I found myself on the central Ringstrasse much sooner than I had expected. The city looked like a toy model of the one in my memory. But things had changed in fact as well as appearance. There were gaps among the houses like missing teeth, and everything seemed somehow a little out of shape. With pounding heart and a feeling of sadness, I drove into Leopoldstadt, the old Jewish section where my family had lived. Once Leopoldstadt had teemed with Jewish life, but only now, when there were no Jews left in it, did it look like a ghetto. The streets looked strangely empty, only one store sign bore a name I remembered. I visited my old high school. It was a moment I had long anticipated. Somewhat to my irrational surprise, the building was still standing. And I found out that my old math teacher was still alive, retired now and living on a pension. I had coffee and pastry with him in a coffee house. We talked about what had become of the other teachers, and I noticed that he mentioned only the "Aryan" ones. I had to ask him point-blank about the Jewish teachers. It was obvious that he had to refer to a completely different filling-cabinet in his mind: the difference between gentle and Jew had become so ingrained that, even a decade after the negation of human beings.

Then I asked, "What's Vienna like without Jews?" "Aren't they back?" he answered, astonished. They were 9,000 out of a population of 180,000. One did not have to be a teacher of mathematics to realize that this came to no more than 5 per cent. Even so, he did not seem happy about the 5 per cent.

"There's Herr Leopoldi, for instance," he said, referring to a popular composer-pianist who had returned from exile in the U.S. "When he landed in New York he knelt down on the pier and kissed the asphalt. He should have stayed there." Then he added with a smirk, "But when he came back to Austria he kissed the ground, too."

MY OLD TEACHER at the Anatomical Institute, now its highest-ranking associate professor, received me with open arms. He had been dismissed by the Nazis in 1938, and because he had remained faithful to his Jewish sweetheart, who had been in my class in medical school, he was

TWO YOUNG immigrant photographers in their early twenties have redeemed the value of the Jerusalem Theatre Gallery as a venue for newcomers. TERRY LOWENTHAL, a graduate of the Rochester (NY) Institute of Technology, and LAWRENCE MIGDALE, from Johannesburg, met while doing graduate work at the photography department of the London Polytechnic.

They arrived here last March to work as volunteers at Kibbutz En Dor, where part of this show was photographed. Migdale's circus essay, also on show, has been acquired by the Eastman House Permanent Collection. He is to begin teaching photography at the Bezalel Academy next month. Lowenthal now does public relations photography here.

Lowenthal has a penchant for pairing photographs in a semi-conceptual manner. At En Dor she made a series called "Object - Shadow" in which she shot such things as a light bracket and then its shadow falling on something else, without the original source appearing in the second photograph.

She also has a series in colour, entitled "Double-portraits of Bushes" (made in Rochester last year), showing shrubs and palms of trees that are very similar in form and sitting but are as individual as people, or as say, soldiers in the same uniform.

Lowenthal's approach is that of the artist: she uses her comparisons to make us look carefully and more perceptively at objects we normally take for granted and otherwise hardly "see" at all.

Migdale's subject matter is people and what many writers still tacitly refer to as "the human condition." In his two series on show here, one of kibbutzniks and volunteers in Purim dress, the other of performers in a Swiss circus, Migdale adopts the frank confrontational approach of the late Diane Arbus, who posed American freaks in their natural habitat (Siamese twins, transvestites, etc.). All of Migdale's subjects look into the lens too, with the same mixture of pride, defiance and resignation.

The Swiss circus-folk studio are superb, beautifully composed and printed; and the types are of course of great interest. By contrast, the people in Purim costume at the kibbutz are bereft of all glamour, treated without charm and all photographed against the same unglamorous shed. The costumes and poses are such that the subjects seem almost pathetic. Some of the prints, which are fairly flat, are hand-tinted in the manner of greeting cards and photographs of yesterday. Migdale seems to suggest a link with this tradition and to do so with no small touch of cynicism. All in all, an interesting exhibit (Till Sept. 22, afternoons only, apart from theatre performance times).

HANNAH HIRSHMAN COHEN is showing a large number of small engravings on copper and a series of colourful monotypes. While her general approach is decorative, there are a few "portrait miniatures" in semi-cartoon style that have great charm; a few of them show real character. They are something of a first in this medium (Jerusalem House of Quality, Hevron 12, Jerusalem), Till Sept. 9.

Limits of glass

Gil Goldfine

GLASS HAS never "made it big" as a sculptural medium. Not even the grand experiment of 20th-century modernism, in which neither image nor substance has been held sacred, could accept the fragility and intransigence of glass. The almost absolute limitations of the substance when it comes to modelling and moulding three dimensional volumes (the exception, of course, is the ancient art of glass blowing, which is not being considered here), have resulted in glass being allocated a low rung on the fine art scale.

Recently, however, the Glass Museum at Ramat Aviv, ostensibly an educational institution devoted to the history of glass, has attempted to elevate the traditional decorative aspect of the craft to a "finer" plane by sponsoring, within its limited space, special group and solo exhibitions.

The current show of glass "sculptures" by the Australian artist ALLEN DAVID highlights the restricted qualities of the vitreous material and the inevitably narrow range of expression. One can almost feel the artist's frustration in having to stop short of realizing something of greater importance.

David's pieces are generally monolithic abstractions. No real modelling takes place — only the additive and constructivist method of creating dimensional art is realised as flat planes are angled or melted onto each other to create low relief and textured surfaces.

Singular, table-sized vertical forms of blunted squares or squashed amorphic shapes rely solely on their surface decoration for aesthetic appeal. But with the exception of two or three works, the colourful glezes — applied in geometric patterns or aplattered uncontrolled between sandwiched sheets of glass — do not occupy one's attention for more than a few seconds. Nor do they project any special reasons for renewed interest or further study.

IN HAIFA

TAMAR SCHWETZ does landscapes, portraits and flowers in various techniques. Best are her flowers, whether in black and white or in colour: all have the simplicity of a posed sitting. The portraits, mostly in black and white, are straight realism; the best is that of the old man (16). The ambitious oil landscapes (except for (8) and (9) within narrow limits) are deficient in composition and detachment; but a black and white drawing (41), evidently of Aore, although more elaborate than the flowers, possesses the same stylistic simplicity. (Ritz Gallery, Haifa.) Till Sept. 30 □

OF THE three painters currently exhibiting at Tzavta Gallery, my preference is for PANASI, whose large Rauschenbergian-inspired panels gleam with lavish colour and contain an adequate array of symbolism, while possessing an intuitive, unmethodical, compositional play of shape, line and collage textures.

Panasi's smaller mixed-media pictures are often packed with images crossbred from such divergent influences as Matise and Osvaldo Romberg, borrowing from the former a freehand brush filled with luminous luscious hues, and from the latter a penchant for diognmatic exercise. Although not overly original, Panasi is open to investigation, inventive and decisive.

After criticizing Yair Garbuz (the Tzavta Gallery director) in this column a few weeks ago for his narrow choice of artists and style, we are now shown the work of CHAIM COHEN, who could easily be given the nom de plume "Son of Garbuz," for he truly tries to echo the Garbuz approach.

First, there appears the idea of aggression and friction in the literal infrastructure, built upon people in conflict; fading, speeding automobiles; and constructivist efforts, all supported by a chaotic palette of roughly brushed pigment within clearly contoured shapes.

Secondly, there is the use of transfer techniques (of photographic images from journals and newspapers altered and changed by overglazing, scrubbing and spraying).

Thirdly, Cohen segments his compositions, so that a particular episode is compartmentalized into a flat repetitive pattern.

The result of all this is a series of panels that, despite the visual bravado, gives one the feeling that one has seen it all before.

Rounding out the trio is YA'AKOV DORCHIN, who shows a potpourri of techniques and images spanning a period of some 15 years. Except for a group of dramatic black and white drawings, in which his furious lines (reminiscent of Alechinsky) battle with the edges of the rectangle in a desperate attempt to escape from the frame, I found his assemblages, collages and non-objective oils uninspiring. (Tzavta Gallery, 30 Ibn Gvrol, Tel Aviv.) Till Sept. 22.

RUMANIAN-born ADOLPH ADLER shows broadly-brushed oil paintings of subjects ranging from female nudes and Spanish still life to occasional allegories of Jewish life and traditions. His standard of drawing is consistently good, unlike that translated into colour and light where the realism becomes rather hackneyed and the reduction towards abstraction (reminding Shmuel Topik) is obvious by the standard compositional grids. Except for the rare passage here and there, the total package is definitely a dusty one (Bograshev, Tel Aviv.) □

THIS IS yet another of those major research works which have remained undimmed by the passage of time. Gedalyahu Alon, Talmud scholar and Graeco-Roman historian par excellence, died in 1980, in the prime of his life and in the midst of his scholarly endeavours at the Hebrew University. Nevertheless, this volume (two to the original Hebrew) and the companion work on Jewish history during the Talmudic age soon to appear in English, are an indication of the scope, quantity and of course calibre of his output.

This collection of essays represents, with a few minor omissions from the original Hebrew, an in-depth, comprehensive study of some problems of prime concern to Jewish and non-Jewish researchers into the Talmud and Talmudic era. Did or did not the rabbis of the Talmud, for example, intend to consign the Maccabees to oblivion and to restate the origins of the Hanukkah festival in terms of a few divinely-ordained, miraculous events? In this by-now-classic discussion, Alon has responded with a resoundingly unequivocal "no" to both queries (which are basically one and the same). More positively put, the author has shown that the Sages, by and large, went so far as to include Hasmonean royalty "among the great national leaders of the era of the Second Temple."

THIS ARTICLE is followed by another on "The Attitude of the Pharisees to Roman Rule and the House of Herod," a highly controversial theme, to say the least. Yet, to hear the views propounded by the main by 19th and early 20th-century Christian scholars (and adopted with some modifications by their Jewish colleagues), one is left with the impression of a rather bland, simplistic approach to the Pharisees' attitude to the Hasmoneans and to Rome was based on their opposition to the politicization of the nation.

According to this thesis, the approach emanated from the rabbis' desire to maintain the Jewish community's peculiarly religious-spiritual character. The logical outcome of this argument: the Pharisees not only fought against the last representatives of the Hasmonean dynasty, but willingly submitted themselves to the rule of Rome and of the House of Herod. A more lopsided and oversimplified (and, according to Alon, distorted) view of the matter would be hard to conceive. On what basis Alon concluded that the Pharisees as a whole were opposed to both Herodian and Roman rule, we shall leave to the reader to find out, in this typically instructive chapter.

The long, very intricate essay on "Philo's Halacha" will demand a good deal of patience, not to subjected themselves to the rule of Rome and of the House of Herod.

A more lopsided and oversimplified (and, according to Alon, distorted) view of the matter would be hard to conceive. On what basis Alon concluded that the Pharisees as a whole were opposed to both Herodian and Roman rule, we shall leave to the reader to find out, in this typically instructive chapter.

The long, very intricate essay on "Philo's Halacha" will demand a good deal of patience, not to mention Philonic and rabbinic erudition on the part of the reader, layman as well as scholar (for whom the work is primarily intended). But for the lay person, this discussion will serve as an eye-opening introduction to the vexed issue; and scholars whose lack of knowledge of modern Hebrew has kept them in ignorance of the essay until now will surely feel amply rewarded for their patience.

INSTANCE after instance, based almost exclusively on Philo's De Specialibus Legibus ("On the Special Laws"), is adduced by Alon to indicate that the Alexandrian Jewish philosopher possessed a knowledge of ancient Jewish legal traditions which were actually acted upon in Eretz Yisrael and in the diaspora of his day.

As an example, Philo sets forth (in I, 51-53) the Tora teachings that grant proselytes the same rights as the native Jews. He continues with a remarkable passage to the effect that should any members of the Jewish community betray the One God, they ought forthwith to be subjected to the severest penalties at the hands of anyone zealous for the Law.

Now, as Alon points out, this type of impromptu justice is contrary to the Halacha, which ordains that idolaters must be tried in court, like other transgressors. As is well known, the rabble of the Talmudic age went to extreme lengths to ensure that the law take its proper course in capital cases.

Yet, according to Alon, there is sufficient evidence in the various Talmudic passages to indicate that in preaching this urgent exhortation Halacha, Philo was basing himself on an ancient Jewish legal tradition — a tradition actually acted upon in Eretz Yisrael and elsewhere in the Jewish world of his time. Alon appears to have a stronger prima facie case for this viewpoint than do his dissenting colleagues for theirs.

OF THE remaining chapters, the two that treat Rabbi Yohanan ben Zakkai must be especially recommended. The first sheds important light on the famous Talmudic episode of the Emperor Vespasian's alleged grant of the town of Yavvo to the great rabbinic leader. This essay is very important for the additional reason that it touches upon the fascinating subject of the immediate post-Revolt period in Eretz Yisrael and, in particular, the rabbinic leadership of the day.

Both this discussion, and the succeeding one on ben Zakkai's patriarchate, constitute one of the most auspicious attempts to shed light on the fascinating, complex, but unfortunately hazy transition era, which was to be so vital to the future of the entire Jewish people.

The masterly treatment of the clash between the Sage and his followers and their antagonists from four different camps, is one more proof of Gedalyahu Alon's vast erudition as Talmudist and scholar of the Greek-Roman world.

The translation is itself one of the last chef d'oeuvre from the pen of the late Israel Abrahams, a scholar in his own right. □

GOURMET FOOD FROM ISRAEL by Ruth Sirkis. Tel Aviv, Zmora, Bitan, Modan Publishers and Steimatzky. 58 pp. IL49.50.

Sybil Zimmerman

THE PURPOSE of this cookbook, according to the author, is "to introduce the current popular Israeli dishes to the American reader." Because of this, each recipe was tested in an American home kitchen. The book is also intended to help tourists in Israel understand and enjoy the foods offered in restaurants, cafes and kiosks.

Ruth Sirkis has the qualifications for the job: she is food editor of the Israeli women's magazine, At, and has a syndicated weekly column in Jewish newspapers in the U.S.

But I would disagree with Mrs. Sirkis that these recipes are for "gourmet food." By most definitions, gourmet food is that which is exceptionally delicate and intricately prepared. Somewhat, everyday dishes like eggplant salad, vegetable soup and schnitzel, and street food like kabab, felafla and Turkish coffee are not my idea of "gourmet" food.

And although it doesn't affect the recipes, I must also comment on one case of sloppy proofreading: in the table of contents on the back cover, there is a case of misnumbering.

The recipes themselves are presented in a handy, pocket-book-size spiral paperback and include the most typical 25 Israeli snacks and first courses, soups and side dishes, main courses, and desserts.

If you're planning a trip to the U.S., this would make a very nice gift. Or if you need gifts to keep around the house, to give to Americans visiting Israel, this will also suit your purpose. □

TERROR OUT OF ZION: Irgun, Zvai Laumi, Lehi, and the Palestine Underground, 1929-1949 by J. Bowyer Bell. St. Martin's. 374 pp. $13.95.

Israel Margalith

leadership has replaced the previous Labour majority, which represented forces opposed, during the British mandatory period, to the militancy and philosophy of the Irgun and Lehi (known as the Stern Gang).

The two last commanders of the anti-British underground, Menachem Begin of the Irgun and Yitzhak Shamir of Lehi, have become, respectively, Prime Minister and Speaker of the Knesset.

In his closing chapter, Dr. Bell mentions en passant the possibility of Begin's Likud bloc being an alternative government. But evaluating Begin's current position in historical perspective, in comparison with other underground leaders in Africa, Asia, Ireland and Cyprus, who all acquired respectability, he states: "... beyond the bounds of the Middle East, Begin and the others somehow never went through that strange transmutation from rebels to respected statesmen."

He attempts to explain the difficulty of rationalising the British oppression in Palestine after the Holocaust, which provoked the underground's response and resulted in the execution of British soldiers taken as hostages and the hanging of underground fighters in retaliation.

Speculating on Begin's political future and posture, Dr. Bell holds that "perhaps a Begin in power, his edges blunted by responsibilities, a man redeemed from murder, might have eased matters. But Begin remained unrepentant, on the far side of the Knesset, with neither substantive power nor parliamentary prospects."

THE FACTS, events and issues recorded and analysed in Dr. Bell's study are still a matter of controversy in Israeli political reality. Scholars and laymen alike are divided in their view of the practical effects of the revolt against the British.

The author gathered his information from numerous interviews with ex-members of both undergrounds, as part of a comprehensive study of anti-British armed insurrections throughout the world. This book was elaborated from one chapter because he found that the Jewish undergrounds "were articulate and had been most efficient," unlike others "where the articulate are often irrelevant, and, more often than not, incompetence is all but institutionalized."

Dr. Bell also interviewed Sir John Shaw, Chief Secretary of the British mandatory government in Jerusalem, the man who in 1948 did not take seriously the warning about the King David Hotel bombing and did not order its evacuation. He analyses this in the objective and impartial manner he also adopts in dealing with Dr. Yassin.

This he describes as a battle against an Arab stronghold, with relatively very great casualties for the Jewish combatants, rejecting the Arab myth about a deliberate massacre. He claims, on the other hand, that lack of coordination between the Irgun and Lehi units made the battle a house-to-house struggle and that the loudspeaker warnings could not be heard by the civilians, who remained in their houses with the armed men.

The author makes a distinction between the more ruthless approach of Lehi and that of the Irgun, which always gave warnings, and declares that "given the grisly events of the next generation, the Palestinian underground was remarkably restrained."

Dr. Bell has written an exciting study. Though limited to printed sources and information because of his lack of knowledge of Hebrew, and despite some minor inaccuracies, he has provided an expert's view of the subject, instructive both for the scholar and for the layman seeking to understand the background to current events in Israel and the Middle East. □

LOVE LETTERS, An Anthology chosen by Antonia Fraser, Illustrations by James Hintonson. London, Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 217 pp. £4.05

Aviva Even-Paz

HOW FITTING that Lady Antonia should be the one to choose this anthology. Luxuriating in love's bower, seemingly untroubled by disturbing thoughts of abandoned husband and six children or of stealing another woman's husband, she looks at us from the back cover, honeycoloured head resting on richly tapestried cushions, costly rings on her fingers, slumbering blue eyes all melting mystery, quite irresistible — and an intellectual to boot.

In her introduction she says that she has gone for "the heart on the sleeve, or at any rate, on paper."

The book is divided into different atmospheres of love such as Declarations, Pleas, Rejections, Ecstasies, Passions, Jealousies, Separations, Fears and Worries, Unions and so on. But as I read letter after letter I probably that was a mistake, they should be taken in small doses, the feeling grew that there wasn't much of a dividing line between these various aspects of love, that being in love necessarily includes being jealous, passionate, rejected, ecstatic, and pleading, declaring, separating, worrying and occasionally unliking.

We have all got our Doctorate in Love but different styles will appeal to different experiences. My favourite is Disraeli to Mary Anne Wyndham Lewis, the rich older widow: "I avow when I first made my advances to you I was influenced by no romantic feelings... I myself, about to compromise a practical career wished for the sake of a home and shrank from all the torturing passions of intrigue. I was not blind to worldly advantage in such an alliance, but I had already proved my heart was not to be purchased. I found you, as I thought, amiable, tender and yet acute and gifted with no ordinary mind... one who could sympathize with all my projects and feelings, console me in the moments of depression, share my hour of triumph and work with me for our honour and happiness." Stripped out of Jane Austen! And how nice to know that they married and lived happily ever after.

On the other hand, it is disconcerting to read Byron, first in 1812 to Lady Caroline Lamb: "mad, bad and dangerous to the know"; "No other, in word or deed, shall ever hold the place in my affections, which is, and shall be, most sacred to you"; and then in 1819 to Teresa Guiccioli: "My destiny rests with you... I more than love you and cannot cease to love you."

Or Victor Hugo to his future wife, Adele Foucher, in 1821: "When two souls have sought for each other, however long in the throng, have finally found each other... there is then established forever between them a union which begins on earth and continues for ever in heaven"; but who, in 1833 receives this letter from his semi-permanent mistress, Juliette Drouot: "If you knew how I long for you, how the memory of last night leaves me delirious with joy and full of desire."

In fact, it seems the soberer the language, the more reliable the union, as in this letter from Morgery Brews to John Paston, written in 1477: "I let you plainly understand that my father will no more money part withal in that behalf, but £100 and 50 marks, which is right far from the accomplishment of your desire." The notes of the back tell us "after some wrangling over the dowry they were married" and no doubt all the happier for getting down to business at the beginning. Who would have thought such ardour on this, "reminding us of a point in astronomy, which is that the longer the days are the hotter; so it is with our love, for although by absence we are parted it nevertheless keeps its fervency," expressed by Henry VIII to Anne Boleyn, would end as it did on the scaffold?

UNABASHED SEX is surprisingly not amongst the foremost preoccupations of these letters. Only Chopin, in a letter to Delphine Potocka, keeps harping on one note, so to speak: "Who knows what ballades, polonaises, perhaps an entire concerto have been forever engulfed in your little D flat major (their code for the female organ, possibly because D flat is the black key between two white keys, C and D). Works which should have come to life, drowned in your sweetest little D flat major, so that you are filled with music and pregnant with my compositions. When you finally arrive in your diligence, I will glue myself to you for a whole week, you won't be able to tear me away from the little D flat major, and to hell with inspiration and ideas."

One would like to quote from the heartrending letter of Camille Desmoulins to his wife before being guillotined in the French Revolution, or from Catherine of Aragon's farewell to Henry VIII or plain Private Bert Fielder from Flanders Field in 1915 to his "dear Scrumps" before being killed, and from Napoleon's missives to Josephine from the battlefield and who seemed ready to jump into bed with his boots on.

A cheerier note is struck by the Prince de Joinville in his note to the Jewish actress Rachel Félix: "Where? When? How Much?" and her reply: "Your place — Tonight — Free." Only one thing is missing from this collection — Lady Antonia's own letter to "Harold" to whom, naturally enough, the book is dedicated.

well-organized. It is divided into two major parts. The first is devoted to the organization and workings of the Foreign Office, ranging from a history of the extraordinary building which houses "the Office," through the selection of the F.O. élite and the fortunes of diplomats overseas to the Whitehall machine and the difficulties of mere communication.

The second part deals with the organization and workings of diplomatic missions abroad, many of which will soon begin to disappear if Parliament accepts the proposals of the committee that has just reported on the need for Britain to come to terms with her diminished importance in world affairs.

The whole book shows how difficult but nevertheless essential it is for an old and experienced diplomatic service to adapt itself to a world in which diplomacy has changed out of all recognition within a single generation. How to cope with such a changing world is the theme of the last chapter of Mr. Moorhouse's book. He quotes Lord Trevelyan's warning that members of a diplomatic service "must adapt themselves to the new order of things, or they will find themselves engaged in little more than opening doors for the experts and acting as dispensers of government hospitality abroad."

THE MORAL of all this is that there is a need in any diplomatic service for more than mere "pragmatism." Mr. Moorhouse, agrees with the Israeli political scientist, Prof. David Vital, that one fairly consistent factor in shaping British foreign policy since the war has been "the adoption of the line of least intellectual resistance... geared essentially to the handling of problems as they arise, rather than to the definition of goals and objectives in terms of which such problems as arise are to be dealt with."

Senior British diplomats freely concede that there is too much pragmatism about the formulation of British foreign policy, says Moorhouse. "What they never make clear," he adds, "is whence it springs."

Reading this excellent dissection of the British diplomatic service, one cannot resist the feeling that something very similar to what has happened to the Foreign Office has been happening to the diplomatic services of most advanced nations. It is a direct result of the re-shaping of the world with the incredibly fast multiplication of independent states, the rise of the Third World, the increasingly crucial importance of oil and other energy sources now largely owned and controlled by non-Western peoples. Thus, though it is exclusively devoted to the British diplomatic machinery, this book should be required reading for all those concerned with the diplomatic game everywhere.

After the Quartet

SICILIAN CAROUSEL by Lawrence Durrell. London, Faber & Faber, 223 pp. £5.25.

Daniel Gavron

IS THERE a generalization that will cover the purpose of writing and reading books, taking into account the stupendous variety of works published? I would like to put forward the following: every book is an attempt to convey understanding to the reader, either in order to enhance his perception of a physical or emotional experience, or simply to impart factual information.

On both these levels Sicilian Carousel is a resounding triumph. It is not just that Lawrence Durrell writes supremely well; we already knew that. Here he has taken a fairly prosaic event, a bus tour of Sicily, and fashioned it into a beautiful work of art.

On the factual level it is almost as good as making the trip yourself: the sights, sounds and smells of this fascinating land are captured and vividly conveyed. On another level it is even better. For it is unlikely that, if you went on the tour, you would be fortunate enough to wind up with so civilized, knowledgeable and charming a travelling companion as the author.

THE SCENERY of Sicily, its mountains, shores, towns, villages, inns and (above all) ruins are lovingly described. At the same time, Durrell's fellow travellers are affectionately and wittily brought to life. From Decade, the former Desert Rat, to Miss Lobb, a London barmaid, down to Beddoes, the pre-school master on the run from some minor act committed in Durgenee, The Italian guide, the Sicilian driver and even the little red bus emerge as distinct individuals drawn by his deft pen.

Had Durrell left it at that we would have little to complain about; but he has done much more.

His visit to Sicily was prompted by the death of an intimate friend, Martine, who had for years been urging him to visit the island. Counterpointed with the smoothly-flowing narrative is a dialogue between Durrell and the dead Martine about the nature of Mediterranean civilization; the role of the olive tree in developing that society; the differing influences of the Greeks and the Romans; philosophy, religion, life and death. It is difficult to convey the richness of every page of this book.

The volume is beautifully illustrated with engravings and, as if this were not enough, six limericks to unpublised poems by the author are thrown in as a bonus.

THE GREAT RAILWAY BAZAAR by Paul Theroux. Penguin Books, 379 pp. 95p.

Robert D. Kaplan

THOSE WHO HAVE travelled by bus through Asia know that the state of each country's culture can be gauged by the performance of its trains. The weekly "express" that connects Istanbul with Tehran always arrives days late, but all the time is lost in Turkey where it takes a whole day to load the cars onto a ferry that crosses Lake Van. A similar train in Japan takes 15 minutes. In the United States, the train has three classes and a vegetarian kitchen. Singhaese trains have cars reserved for Buddhist monks. In Pakistan, I learned, it's not the seat reservations that count, but whether the train is paid to secure your seat for you runs faster than his competitors. And in Afghanistan, a country where many of the members of parliament are illiterate, there just aren't any trains at all.

American-born Paul Theroux, whom the New York Times called one of the most underrated good writers around, reports that a "railway bazaar represented the society so completely that to board it was to be challenged by the national character."

Theroux is most adroit in the more it seemed like a slower journey across Asia, it is not so much the trains as the people he meets on them that are revealing. "Most Indians I met had jobs that defied analysis. They were salesmen for firms that made seamless tubes, plastic washers or bleaching agents; they marketed bench marks or hapsa sets for manila folders. Once I met a Sikh who made rubber goods, but nothing ample like tyres or con- troceptives; he made bushings and onds enings. I sold I didn't under- stand. He explained: 'Casings — glimping. The longer the rubber ones — for lugged sprockets.'"

In Turkey the author meets a writer who is an "ardent sup- portor of both the Soviet govern- ment and Solzhenitsyn, which is something like rooting for the devil as well as Daniel Webster; he is a Muslim Marxist, his wife is a Jew, and the only foreign coun- try he likes better than Russia is Israel."

GIVEN THE author's annoying idiosyncrasy — he is parsnoid about homosexuals and keeps ask- ing for a private compartment — he nevertheless manages to meet an assortment of characters who explode his fears, but not his scepticism. After finding himself alone with a lot Turk, Theroux says: "I'm not, um, queer. Well, you know, I don't like boys and —" The Turk replies: "And me, I don't like." He then lies down and goes to sleep.

Theroux passes off Afghanistan as a "nonsense." He writes that the food there "smells of cholera." How, precisely, can food "smell of cholera"? However, as any reader of Jungle Lovers, or of Theroux's other novels, can attest, the author has an acerbic wit and is good at catching the rot beneath the sur- face in an exotic locale. And The Great Railway Bazaar is not dis- appointing in this respect. Of Vientiane he writes: "The brothels are cleaner than the hotels, marijuana is cheaper than pipe tobacco, and opium easier to find than a cold glass of beer... The only English film I could find in Vientiane was a por- nographic one... Laoe was one of America's practical jokes, a motiveless place where nothing was made, everything im- ported... The more I thought of it, the more it seemed like a slower journey across Asia, it is not so much the trains as the people he meets on them that are revealing.

For the author, the places are not so important as "the getting there." As he writes, "if a train is seamless tubes, plastic washers or bleaching agents; they even need a destination, a corner seat is enough." Sitting secure in- side the railway car, while all Asia flashed by outside, the author had the sensory delights of travel without actually having to deal with the alien milieu he was standing. He explained: "Casings — glimping. The longer the journey, the greater the security. For to stop was to give up his "private world of memory and language" and be forced to take on the environment.

"The longer the journey, the happier I was," exclaims Theroux. Anyone who has travel- led knows the feeling.

Cast of slayers

LAST DITCH by Ngalo Marah. Little Brown, Boston, 285 pp. $3.95.

THE SNOW RATTLERS by Shepherd Rifkin. Putnam, New York, 222 pp. $7.95.

CHANCE AWAKENING by George Markstein. Souvenir Press, London, £3.50, 261 pp.

Philip Gillon

THE NEW TWIST in Ngalo Marah's latest novel is not in the development of the plot, but in the cast of players. The hero is not Chel Superintendent Roderick Alkaya, but his son, Ricky.

Ricky has no desire to be either a super-detective like the gover- nor or even a painter like his mother, Troy; all he wants is to be a writer, so he goes off to an obscure island to write the Great Novel.

aleuthery thrust upon them. This is what happens to poor Ricky. Or maybe he cannot escape the deadly locked in his genes. Crimes pursue him, thrust him into dark waters, subject him to tortures.

As a mystery, the book poses no great problems; the villains are there, easy to be seen, and it is not very difficult to detect their nefarious schemes. But the attraction of Ngalo Marah's work lies not in a tricky poser, but in development of character under stress, and a capacity to write well and to give a sense of place. In its own old-fashioned way, this is a very good, leisurely descrip- tion of Ricky's adventures, and his capacity to endure travail.

THE SNOW RATTLERS is the op- posite, very modern, very tough, very terse, although here too there is no effort to conceal the cloak and dagger, or the identity of the villains. There is, however, a surprise punch in the ending. The hero, Damian McQuaid, is as tough a homicide detective as ever trudged the fictional streets of New York. But he finds himself far out of his native element when he tries to play cowboys and Red Indians in the high snows of Arizona and New Mexico. The ending, to which I have already referred, offends one's sense of what is right and fitting, in de- tective fiction as well as real life. Surely McQuaid could have used the billionaire husband to provide an antidote for rattlesnake poison? But the hard-hitting book is certainly a gripper.

Equally absorbing, and far more subtle, is Chance Awaken- ing. George Markstein writes cris- ply, sparsely and well. His plot is full of the most subtle turns and convolutions. Here too there is a new twist, the hero is a Soviet " sleeper," Michael Golly, a man of courage, intelligence, and great integrity. The " sleeper " is awakened by Moscow, and fights for his sanity in maze after maze weaved around him by British and American enemies. But who are they? Which cards are honest, and which are counterfeit? A first-rate and very satisfying thriller.

THE COMPUTER was either sur- ly, mischievous, unhappy in its job, or off on reserve duty the other morning, when it was sup- posed to wake me at 3:15 a.m. The night before I had done that nerve-racking bit of dialling which usually, though not always, gets you the "automatic alarm service," as it's called in the English telephone directory, or "Shard Yekita," as it appears in Hebrew.

It's nerve-racking because you have to execute 13 digits flawlessly, and the slightest fingerling mishap might just possibly connect you with Anti- guo instead, or else wake up some poor soul in place of you. But I know I dialled beautifully, as a subsequent silly complaint to the telephone authorities proved. And yet, utter stillness at 3:15, when, nervously, I was already awake and expecting the phone call that never came.

After several rather sweet conversations with operators and supervisors who, of my urging,

Alarm and mating service

Helga Dudman

Interpreted the Little Black Box and the Data Input and Output. I was told that the computer had, in fact, called me. Twice, too. No apology, no thought that the customer might have misread a plane or some cruel pre-down assignment. No: the computer had performed impeccably while I rudely refused to answer.

The key to the mishap, it seems clear, lies in the computer's demoralizing sense of under- utilization. After a classy and ex- pensive education it finds itself ending up underemployed, like so many computers here and elsewhere, with nothing but dumb little functions way below its capacity.

SO WHY NOT give the computer a challenge? We would almost certainly see an improvement in service if, for instance, instead of just having to wake you up by tell- ing you the time, which is not a very thrilling or personal way of starting the day, the computer were entrusted with a sequence of interestingly programmed num- bers. It would be a happier, more fulfilled computer, and its messages would be custom-made to suit individual emotional needs at wake-up time.

This would combine the "alarm" function with the matchmaking one, which com- puters are so much better at than we are. "Alarm," by the way, when used without the word "clock," seems pretty strong: I am thinking of something more in the spirit of Richard III, "our stern alarms changed to merry meetings..." Dialling would be a mile more complicated, but well worth it. Even for the present impersonal recording, some potential customers are put off by that "174507890615," the suggested model in the telephone directory. But with, say, a digital input of only 174507890615, the suggested you could get yourself woken by a tall(30) academic (5) traditional (98) rich (847) cultured techni- cian (3) serious, sympathetic, with own car (745) who would start your day by whispering (3) an inspirational verse (2) with barely audible canary chirp in the background (889) and concluding with a short summary of the cheerful items in the late news and a reminder that we are born anew each day (78) in various languages (11) at 5:45 a.m. (0045).

Alternatively, you might choose being awakened forcefully (718), or gently and reverently (918), or ambiguously, with a Spanish song (2818), or spine-tingling (47), or via the BBC news and tug at the sheets (633), or the Separata extension line are recommended for married folk. The 174 stays the same. A few additional pages in the directory would cover all the needed codes. The computer would un- questionably be more highly motivated, happier in its work. And we could start our days with custom-dialled awakenings hav- ing great partnership potential. Dialling errors could be dangerous, because you might conceivably get a 1m28 academi- cian, divorced (128522) when you'd hopefully dialled for 1m28 married plumber (13344). However, maybe the computer knows best. And it's better to be aroused by an overmotivated one than never to be woken up at all.

CALORIE COUNT-DOWN

Ephraim Kishon

"EPHRAIM," the little woman asked, "do you think I'm fat?" "No," said I. "No, you're not."

"But you are!" "Then so are you, Fatty." Actually we're neither of us fat in the full sense of the word. My wife may be a bit roly-polyish at the edges, and I am somewhat prominent in profile, but that's a matter of how you look at it rather than what the scales say.

But we went and joined the Weight Watchers anyway, because we like to be in. Also, the little one's friends kept telling her all these monotonous-to-mildrag stories, like how this girl lost 80 pounds in a month, which may not sound like much to you but vna a fortune for the poor girl.

At the Weight Watchers we were received by one lady who needed watching herself, and one lean gentleman who served on a Good Example.

"Only three months ago ha used to offer her seat in the bus to two old ladies," we were told. "Now he's a ballet dancer."

HERE THE dancer took over to explain the W.W. rules. As soon as you join, he said, we open a file against you. Then you pay your membership dues, and for that you receive a weekly breakfast and a printed menu. Now, don't worry, you don't have to stop eating, only give up the good things in life. Bread, butter, spaghetti, schnitzel are out. So are peas, beans, nuts and above all, starches. No starches! Kohlrahl, on the other hand, you may eat as much as you like. Cab- bage too. Some milk, and plenty of fish.

Exercise is no good because it only makes you hungry. The best thing to do is to lie flat on the floor and take a glass of tepid water once a week. At the end of it you come here to be weighed, and if you aren't found wanting you should be ashamed of yourself. If you are, you get a pat on the back and are sent home for more of the same.

"Splendid," I said, "I never did like exercise."

NEXT THE LADY took us away to be weighed — shoeless but with our keys.

"Sorry," she said, "You aren't overweight enough."

Our spirits sank. That such a petty formality should keep us from joining the Great Family of Watchers! The maddening part of it was that I myself was only six lbs. short of the required minimum, and the little one, being little, only three. They said we were lucky to be disqualified together, sometimes they had to send only one half of a couple home. People get divorced for less.

Wo, at our rate, went home together and started eating our way through the entire list of for- bidden foods, till we felt we'd qualify at least as borderline cases. Then we trudged back to the W.W., and just to be on the safe side I filled my pockets with 1L60 in small change — and tipped the scales.

"Welcome to the W.W.," said the lady. "Now I can open a file for you."

The Good Example gave us our orders. "Three big meals a day," he said. "Don't starve yourselves. And vary, vary. If you get sick of cabbage, by all means switch to cauliflower. And remember: starch is poison. See you next week."

WE RETURNED home and started on our diet. Our cheese was invariably white and lean, our bread green and cucumber. Then we went back to be weighed, and almost died with shame because we had gained three ounces without a penny in our pockets.

"Yes," the lady pointed out, "I've seen it happen before. You'll have to be stricter with yourselves."

So then we ate nothing but kohlrahl for a week and we didn't gain weight but we didn't lose any either. We felt badly let down, and were sent to talk it over with some fellow W.W.s to boost our morale. It turned out that the same thing had happened to them: it's a case of one's body refusing to cooperate. It just won't count calories, and what can you do?

"Skip a meal a day," one veteran Watcher suggested. "Go swimming," said another,

"and show your body what it feels like to weigh less."

The little one had meanwhile discovered an old pharmacy where the scales were out of order, but half the women of Tel Aviv were always queuing up in front of it — and anyhow, cheat as you may, truth will out at the W.W.

We soon realized we were stuck: no gain, no loss. I looked at the little one and, frankly, I was surprised. How come she wasn't losing weight?

I did have a vague idea why I wasn't — a little bird told me I was moonlighting in the kitchen every night.

The kohlrahl was getting its own back.

Actually I guess it was simply the seven-week itch. I woke up one night with an irresistible urge to smell the sweet smell of hot oil. And I knew I just had to fry something or I'd bust. I wanted starch, lovely starch.

I jumped out of bed, tiptoed to the kitchen and emptied an enormous bag of popcorn into a pot of boiling oil. I sprinkled sugar over the white mountain by the spoonful and devoured the lot — fat, starch, poison and all. That was the beginning of my caloric binge. It was potato crisps one night and whipped cream the next, and I really had a lovely time, even if rather tiring on account of the double life I was now leading — days of legal, limitless kohlrahl, and nights of cakes and ale.

Ephraim, I would warn myself, you'd better start smoking before it's too late.

AND THEN came the confronta- tion.

One midnight I'm standing by the stove frying bananas when the sleepy figure of my wife enters, makes straight for the laundry basket and digs up a dozen bars of milk chocolate. She peels off the first wrapper, and with her mouth full throws me a conspiratorial wink and generously offers me a bar.

We eat there for half an hour eating chocolate, till all of a sudden my instinct for self-preservation awoke. I crawled to the telephone and dialled the W.W. with the last of my strength.

"Come quick... we're eating... chocolate."

"Hold on!" the Example on duty yelled back. "We're com- ing!"

The car pulled up with a squeal of brakes. They kicked down the door and found us out cold under the table amid the torn wrappers. They only managed to save the last two bars.

"Never mind, my dears," the Good Example comforted us. "This happens to everybody; you regain in an hour what you've lost in a year of kohlrahl. Then you start again from scratch."

"Please," we begged, "No more kohlrahl!"

"All right. Lettuce."

But we decided to leave the W.W. Instead. We were failures, end we knew it.

So now I am prominent in profile again, and the little one is roly-polyish at the edges, but so what? Fat people are kind, they're cheerful, and they rarely fly off the handle, on account of the time it takes for the anger to spread through them. They aren't aggressive either, because they can't run.

So let's get fat, everybody, and let the devil eat kohlrahl. We're on the side of the angel cake. □

WITHOUT JEWS

jailed for "race defilement," while who was sent to Auschwitz. He was drafted into the army, and when he returned to Vienna in 1945, he found his old sweetheart, who had miraculously survived, and married her.

I repeated to him the question I had asked my old mnt teacher: "What's Vienna like without Jews?"

He was taken aback, thought for a while, and then said with a chuckle, "You see, Herr Kollege, we manage. Oh, yes," he reminded himself, "the other day they put on Linen from Ireland at the theatre. You probably remember that one of the characters is supposed to speak with a Jewish accent. He did it badly."

The city of Sigmund Freud, Arthur Schnitzler, Stefan Zweig, Franz Werfel, Karl Kraus, Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schoenberg, Bruno Walter, Fritz Kreisler and Max Reinhardt, the city whose most beloved and typical song, the Fischerlied, was written by a Jew, and most of whose solemnity might be the very ones who, some Jews, such as Oscar Straus, Leo Fall and Emeric Kalman, (even like myaalf in Eastern Europe. Straus, was of Jewish descent), could not look at one of the city's new lacked a single actor who could speak with a Jewish accent.

AUSTRIA was indeed managing without her Jews. The universities were now only average. The once-famous medical school was just one more medical school. The theatre was still very good, but all the plays were old or imported; four theatres were showing plays by Schnitzler. Not a single Austrian writer was known beyond the country's borders. Most of the newspapers, though retaining their old prestige-laden names, had become provincial and were written in a mechanical, colourless German. What had, apparently, remained as good as over was musical life.

In the '20s, Hugo Betteluer had written a novel, The City without Jews, about what Vienna would be like if the anti-Semites had their way. His fantasy was not completely realized, because the gap left by the departure of the Jews in the economy had been filled by American money. Vienna still had charm for tourists who, ignorant of the old Vienna, could take the new provincialism for the old Gemutlichkeit.

Visiting one of the famous Heurigen (wine taverns), I suddenly realized that the men- uing at the tables around me might be the very ones who, some years before, had murdered Jews like myaalf in Eastern Europe. During my entire stay in Vienna I could not look at one of the city's many attractive, buxom girls without wondering how she would have reacted to a Jew some years earlier.

THE FEW JEWS who had come back to Vienna to stay did not feel very different, I discovered.

I asked an acquaintance who had returned from the U.S. and married a young Viennese gentle, how he felt as a Jew living in Vienna. He answered, in his wife's presence:

"Oh, it's very simple. All you have to do is to close both eyes and ears. I always have the impres- sion that people feel uneasy when I come in. Do they wonder how I survived or why on earth I came back? Maybe I look like a ghost to them — and who's comfortable in the presence of a ghost?"

Dr. Emil Mourer had been a friend of one of my uncles. He had been prominent in the Social Democratic Party, and at the time of this first visit of mine was the president of the Kultusgemeinde, the Jewish communal organiza- tion.

We paid an afternoon visit to his spezial Heurigen. As I saw him look, glass in hand, downpast the vineyards of Slovering at the church towers of Vienna rising out of the mist, I understood how much a part of the setting he was. He had spent the Hitler years in England, and he made no bones about why he had returned to Austria.

"Look," he said, "I'm too old to fight with prepositions in a foreign language. I've been a lawyer for 40 years. Why should I be a sales clerk somewhere else if I can practise my profession here?"

"And how is your social life?" I asked.

He looked at me as if I were a visitor from another planet. "Social life with whom?"

I FINALLY located a Nazi cinemamats who had survived. There had been no bad feeling between us personally during our high-school days. Later on, when both of us were studying at the uni- versity, he had warned me one day that there was going to be an anti-Semite brawl. Now we met at a Kaffeehaus. He looked trim and well, though he was limping as a result of a war wound. He had become a schoolteacher.

"What are you teaching?" I asked him.

He said innocently, "History."

"Where do you put the empha- sis, especially when you come to the '30s and '40s?"

He looked at me with amaze- ment and said, "You know, I never thought of that. I teach an- cient history, and never touch the modern period. Now that I come to think of it, I'm rather happy I don't have to."

He told me that his world had collapsed with Germany's defeat. He had been ready to re-learn Democracy had, after all, defeated Nazi Germany. But as time passed, it turned out that Hitler's main mistake was not whining the war.

It was certainly not much fun being an Austrian. It had been more fun making history than teaching it. Without my question- ing, it would not have occurred to him to think about all these things. He certainly did not know all the answers. Did I?

I GOT AN EVEN clearer view of what went on in the mind of an Austrian "Aryan" when I visited my father's old store. A neighbour had taken it over, thereby enlarg- ing his own shop.

"Oh yes," said the owner's wife, "we remember your father." She was visibly relieved when I turned out that my visit was just a see- mental one, and told me about how she and her family had suf- fered during the war. They had been bombed.

And then, as if it had just oc- curred to her, she added, "Isn't it funny? We who stayed behind were bombed, and those who emigrated now want restitution."

ON LATER trips, I did not search any more. If you ask no leading questions, the Viennese are very pleasant indeed. Vienna is a baroque gem; and the Alpine scenery is heartbreakingly beautiful. □

PLASTIC PARADISE

THERE ARE two Southern Californias — the real and the plastic. The real California is where people live, shop, swim, work, hold barbecues and go to church and synagogue. That is interesting to the visitor as a socio-economic phenomenon, and that is what I wrote about last week.

Then there is the Southern California that tourists flock to see, the California of Disneyland and the Universal Studios' movie sets, Sea World and Magic Mountain, and Ports o' Call 'New England' fishing village. These are the plastic wonderlands — artificially constructed attractions that provide wholesome escapism for whole families. Since we are here with our children, we have spent a considerable time in each of the above mentioned paradises. At one point, while walking through Disneyland, I suddenly looked down and realized that even the sidewalks under our feet were made of green vinyl plastic! My mention of the unreality of it all is not meant to be a criticism. On the contrary, there is much that those who cater for tourists in Israel could learn from Southern California.

At all the wonderlands, I was particularly impressed by the efficient handling of large crowds, by the imaginative playground equipment for children, by the fast-food restaurants (and the current fish-'n'-chips oraze), and by the cleanliness of the public lavatories.

Time magazine recently devoted an entire section to America's best amusement parks, and concentrated on those it termed "theme parks," the ones built around a central theme. The most famous, of course, is Disneyland at Anaheim. It is designed around the wonderful fantasy world of Walt Disney characters, headed by the indomitable Mickey Mouse. But it also contains a good deal of historical and literary Americana, from a reconstructed old-time Main Street to an adventure-park Tom Sawyer Island.

While nothing really tops Disneyland, a close runner-up is Sea World in San Diego, which is dedicated to the living creatures of the sea. You can pick up live starfish and play with them, and you can watch an astounding performance by a real live trained "killer whale."

It was in the heart of San Diego's Sea World that I ran into Israelis from my Tel Aviv neighbourhood. We overheard people speaking Hebrew, and we answered back. One of the women recognised me; our children went to kindergarten together. It's a small world indeed.

"IT'S A SMALL WORLD" is also the title of one of the best exhibits in Disneyland. Small motor boats take you on a colourful, musical cruise through a world of animated dolls representing "more than 100 nations." The attraction is sponsored by the Bank of America. (Many theme-park attractions are sponsored by commercial companies, who help cover the tremendous construction and upkeep costs in return for the publicity.)

Obviously, we looked for dolls representing Israel, and were disappointed not to find any — although there were several representing the Arab world. My six-year-old, whose eyes are sharper than mine, did spot a poster reading "Shalom" in English and in Hebrew, in a half-darkened passageway as we floated through. We wondered if Arab boycott pressure had anything to do with the absence of a few horn-donning kibbutznik figurines among all the other dancing dolls.

I found a familiar touch of home, however, in another part of Disneyland — the Tobacco Outlet Shop on Main Street. There, in plain sight, were Israeli-made "Time" and "Dubek Filice," marked $1 (about 11.10) a pack, making them one of the most expensive brands on sale. (You can get Japanese "Peace" cigarettes for 75 cents.)

What does it cost to spend a day at Disneyland? Not counting the gasoline for the hour's drive each way, the day cost us about $75, including meals for two adults and four children (our three plus a cousin). The biggest single expense was the admission tickets including "eleven rides" apiece — a total of $38. We spent 50 cents for parking, and $7 on four souvenir Mickey Mouse hats. Lunch came to $17, soft drinks through the day to about $3, and supper (not in Disneyland) to just $9.

Disneyland, by the way, tends to be the most expansive of the California theme parks, partly because there are so many appealing attractions and partly because you need a coupon for each ride or exhibit and must buy more if you use up your booklet. At some of the other parks, such as Sea World and Magic Mountain, once you pay the general admission fee you can see and return to any attraction free of charge.

At Disneyland, however, you can save up leftover coupons and use them another day. A couple of complete strangers, seeing us with so many children in tow, gave us their leftover tickets as they were leaving the park.

WE HAD BEEN warned in advance — by Time magazine, too — about the long queues at some of the Disneyland attractions, and we were prepared for the worst. As I said, one of the things that impressed me most favourably about the park was its system for handling large crowds. It begins when you get to the gigantic parking lot. Orange-and-blue uniformed attendants direct your vehicle to the nearest vacant space and collect a mere 11¢ for all-day parking. You then board a free mini-bus that takes you to the main gate — and back again when you leave.

"I would like to remind you that you are parked in sections W6-78 and 9 — W" as in Winnie-the-Pooh," the attendant announced as we left for the main gate. This kind of efficiency was typical throughout the park. I later learned from a Californian friend that "people come to Disneyland from all over to study crowd control." I wish we would send a study mission from Israel.

True there are attractions for which you must stand in line for more than an hour — but, fortunately for us, these were mainly the breathtaking rollercoaster-type rides which we were happy to avoid. But there is also plenty to see and do even at the height of the tourist season that doesn't require queuing-up for more than 20 minutes. And the queues are so organized that they move quickly. Instead of a long straight line, which could provoke a sense of despair, you stand in short-looking queues that weave in and out a maze of railings before reaching the entrance gates.

Perhaps because of the good organization, the crowd responds accordingly — without pushing or shoving to get ahead. I do not think this is attributable solely to differences in national character — I have seen Americans push and shove, too, on the New York subways, for instance.

THERE IS also efficient handling of large numbers of customers in a short time at the many fast-food restaurants throughout the U.S. Admittedly, the food at such places has a certain sameness about it and is hardly gourmet fare. But for inexpensive meals, hygienically served, and quickly, America is hard to beat. If the latest fad in Israel, one of the big sellers in fast food in the U.S. today is British-style fish-and-chips.

This battered, deep-fried fish is made from inexpensive fillet — something we get in abundance in Israel. It should be a very successful fast food item in Israel, too, and would appeal to those who are reluctant to eat meat at places where kashrut is not strictly observed. It should also prove a cheaper fast food than those which require meat.

If the hygienically-prepared food impresses me in the U.S., the cleanliness of most public toilet facilities impresses me even more. Although I grew up in America, my years in Israel blurred my memory of the public restrooms here, which are not only clean, but well-stocked with toilet paper, soap and paper towels or cloth roller-towels, or, more common today, electric air blowers to dry the hands.

Many restrooms here have something I have never seen in Israel — throwaway paper seat-covers for toilets. I know paper goods are costly in Israel, so perhaps a luxury like this could be provided for a fee. But surely simple cleanliness costs no more in Israel — and probably less, since wages are lower. When the restrooms in crowded Disneyland are clean, one cannot attribute this merely to better hygiene habits on the part of the public. A lot depends on the desire of park operators to provide tolerable facilities.

Public drinking-water fountains are another familiar feature of American parks and department stores; in Israel, you are virtually forced to buy sweetened soft drinks or go thirsty — and frequent drinking is even more important in our Israeli climate than in most of the U.S.

A FINAL striking feature of California's theme parks is the imagination that went into playground equipment for children. Here I am not talking about the motorized rides, but the equipment on which kids can climb and play by themselves, free of charge, expending their own muscle-power and energy. (The closest things in Israel are the growing number of "adventure parks," such as the one on the North Tel Aviv side of the Yarkon River, and one under construction in Kiryat Haim near Haifa.) At Captain Kidd's Corner of Sea World, for instance, youngsters can jump safely on a junior-style trampoline or crawl around in a pit filled with soft-plastic balls — a sensation of "swimming" which is hard to describe but which the kids seem to love. There are more daring rope-ladders and awing bridges for older children.

California's theme parks are definitely something that we would do well to imitate in Israel. Some years ago, there was a plan to build a "Bibland" near Jerusalem — a Biblical theme park along the pattern of Disneyland. I don't remember who the promoters were, or why they abandoned the scheme. In my opinion, the capital layout would be well worth the result — both for the Israeli public and the tourist appeal. We could have a boat cruise through Jonah's Whale, a David-and-Goliath Slingshot Competition (for prizes), an elevator ride up David's Tower, an Oriental meal in Bathsheba's Rooftop Restaurant, an after-dark Purim Adloyada Parade to parallel Disneyland's dramatic night-time Electrical Parade of fantasy floats. There is no shortage of ideas. □ Martha Meisels

A fig for your fancy

CULINARY NOTES
Haim Shapiro

A FRUIT TREE in the garden can be both a blessing and a curse.

We, for example, are blessed with a mulberry tree in our back yard. When the tree is in fruit, we are awakened at about 6 a.m. daily by a series of neighbourhood wrehlins busily gathering fruit. We tended to put up with them until we saw that their mothers had provided them with pots so that they could bring the berries home more easily.

Our neighbours with a fig tree have a different problem. They have two vociferous dogs who keep the urehlns out; but this has left them with as many figs that they are quite sick of them. No sooner did we greedily admire the figs on their tree than they immediately invited us to pick them to our hearts' content.

And pick them we did. When we arrived home, we were quite agghet at both the quantity and quality of what we had taken. There were far too many to eat and many were not fit to eat. We began by throwing out those that were obviously wormy or overripe. Those that were just right immediately went on the table, but this left a great many not quite ripe enough for eating raw. Being lazy as well as greedy, we rejected such industrious projects as making jam from them or drying them on the roof.

BUT WE DID find one suggestion acceptable. We were advised to bake them, much in the manner of apples, sprinkled with brown sugar and a little water. After 20 minutes in a medium oven, the figs were done.

Proud of our efforts, we brought a few over for another neighbour to try. She pronounced them good, but told us how we could make them even better.

Here, then, is the improved recipe for baked figs: Wash and trim the stems off about 20 firm, not quite ripe, figs. Place them in an oven pan, preferably one in which they just fit. Sprinkle the fruit with about two tablespoons of sugar and a tablespoon of ground cinnamon. Pour about half a cup of brandy into the pan and bake in a medium oven for about 20 minutes. For the ultimates in luxury, serve hot or cold, with unwhipped sweet cream. □
